Stewartia School students created this mural, on display at Parent & Body's History and Wonders of Orewa Estuary exhibition at Estuary Arts. It depicts their hopes for how Orewa Estuary could look if it were free of pests with native plants, insects, fish and birds thriving. The exhibition coincides with the release of a plan to restore the estuary that involves Council working with community groups to target pests, plant natives and monitor silt levels.

Estuary restoration plan launched

A plan designed to restore the degraded environment of Orewa Estuary, in collaboration with the community, was launched last week. Its author, senior ecologist Terry Payne of Wright Consulting, describes the plan as "unique in Auckland" and "a game first step" in improving the water quality and function of the estuary. The Orewa Estuary Restoration Plan was funded by the Hibiscus & Bays

Local Board at a cost of $15,000. Chair John Purdie says the study was commissioned because the local board is concerned that the Orewa Estuary ecosystem has not received the focus it deserves. She says the plan will unlock potential funding to make restoration projects happen. It received a generally positive response at the launch at Estuary Arts Centre on September 27 from assembled groups that included Hibiscus Coast Trustee & Bird and sealions who live by the estuary. However, there were also strong reservations that it would not deal with some of the biggest concerns – the increase in sediment coming from development around the estuary and the associated spread of mussels. One person called it "a band aid" and another said that the report "has seriously missed the point".

Mr Payne said that the plan requires the community to take action and make changes to be involved, including schools, alongside Council's biodiversity and parks teams. It aims to coordinate, inform and measure efforts that are already underway by locals such as Hibiscus Coast Trustee & Bird, the Management Group and sealions Management Group and sealions
